

If you are still not convinced of the merits of the Internet and are still viewing it with distrust and suspicion the following points should help you decide:

Speed:

You may access vacancies on the Internet 24/7 with the click of your mouse. By entering the position you are seeking you may perform an exhaustive search within a matter of minutes and download the information relevant to your specific job search.

There is now a wealth of recruiters and employers positioned on the Internet primed to place candidates in successful employment.

Rather than trawling through reams of paper you may complete all your activities in a paperless manner, saving you both time and stress.

Convenience:

You no longer have to wait for the evening edition of the newspaper to come out so that you may begin the urgent process of the all important phone calls.

It is no longer necessary to drive around and meet recruitment specialists leaving copies of your resume and detailed information on your job requirements.

You may now access agencies, recruiters and employers directly on the Internet. In addition to this you may sign up for notifications each time a position suiting your background becomes available putting you in the enviable position of an early application.

Range of positions:

As the Internet is a global tool it is now possible to locate vacancies internationally in addition to the vacancies within your own location. In truth there is no limit to the scope of this tool and you may specify job type, job description, location in addition to any other requirements you have.

Research:

You may access the volumes of information that the Internet has to offer while conducting the research required to perform an extensive job search. This information should be used effectively to improve the quality of your application and your interview performance.
